Student Satisfaction Improving in Most Areas

According to the results of a national survey designed to measure student satisfaction across a wide range of campus services and areas, current Berea students are more satisfied than those enrolled five years ago and compare favorably to students at other four-year private institutions. Areas of strength included those related to course content, instruction and faculty quality, advising in major fields, and the ability of students to experience intellectual growth at Berea. Challenge areas included the adequacy of financial aid, registration without conflicts, faculty fairness in their treatment of individuals, and the general enjoyment and sense of security associated with living on campus. Across most major categories of the survey, International students’ ratings were higher than domestic students’ ratings. In general, ratings by African American students and other domestic students were very similar.

This project began in 1998 when a comprehensive student satisfaction survey was first administered (using Labor time for students to participate). The Committee on Student Experience (COSE), comprised of faculty, administrators and other staff representing academics, student life and various programmatic areas, reviewed the results of the survey. The group then worked three years to understand the data, make recommendations to campus and implement many changes where possible. Many other groups and individuals worked on implementing these initiatives as well as finding other ways to improve our system and processes. When the survey was re-administered in 2003, satisfaction had improved in almost all areas.
Response from the Provost’s Committee

This is a good example of what a difference people working together to improve the system can do. Although last year’s data show improvement in most areas, there are still some student ratings we’ll be examining more closely to better understand and respond appropriately.

For example, we’ve created new financial aid packaging that aligns term bills with the family’s ability to pay. We’ve also eliminated Short Term charges for room, board and fees, and reduced summer housing costs. In the Student Life area, we’ve increased team-based structures to provide leverage for division-wide student development initiatives and support for student clubs and organizations. We’ve also recently completed a comprehensive review of the Labor Program that includes initiatives for revisioning and revitalizing our policies and procedures. Our new Learning Center in Draper Hall is becoming increasingly effective in supporting the needs of both faculty and students. We continue to renovate student residence halls to include more study and community spaces. In light of these findings, we are also reviewing services and the environment at College Health Services and have developed cross-divisional protocols for various campus events of concern to students (e.g., assault, harassment, suicide, etc.) that will prescribe policy and process in these areas and involve Student Life, Public Safety, Campus Ministry, College Health and the Counseling staff.

We will be sending more Study Briefs over the next few weeks. Please send your ideas, comments, or questions to Judith Weckman. Also, feel free to contact any of the Provost's Committee members listed below.

38. Besides the free tuition and overall financial aid package, what attracted you to Berea?

39. If another student at Berea told you he/she was considering dropping out, what would you say to him/her?
Committee on Student Experiences (COSE)

A Five Year History
Five years ago...

Administrative Committee asked that a survey of student satisfaction be administered.

Purpose:

To understand issues related to student retention and to gain student perspectives that may lead to the improvement of program and service quality.

180 items
Noel-Levitz--98 items
Berea-Specific--82 items
Major sections of the surveys

• student perceptions of faculty and staff
• quality of various programs and services
• campus climate
• reasons for considering dropping out
• perceptions of GST courses
• stress levels of students
• suggestions for improvements in student life area
Over 80% of degree-seeking students responded to survey.

Major Results

-- Berea students less satisfied than national averages on all major areas of the survey except academic advising and campus support services.

- Gaps between importance and satisfaction were also significantly greater Relative Gaps Between Importance and Satisfaction (On Seven-Point Scales)

Comparing Berea and National Norms
Selected Results

- Women were less satisfied and gaps were higher.
- Seniors were less satisfied.
- Higher GPA students were more satisfied.
- Out-of-territory students were more satisfied.

The Process:

The COSE group worked for over 2 years; representatives from the faculty, administration, program directors.

The group constructed follow-up focus groups, monitored the relationship to retention and came to consensus on 12 formal recommendations (sent to everyone on campus).

An intentional look at data and areas of concern and possibility.

COSE acted as an agent to lift up issues and bring them to the attention of administrators, departments, committees, and individuals.

Provided the impetus in some cases for changes made or in other cases it confirmed processes already under way.

Relationship of Student Satisfaction Survey Results to Student Retention

by Judith Weckman
Office of Institutional Research and Assessment

The following report was submitted to the Committee on Student Experiences in March of 1999. It examines the relationship of the results of student satisfaction surveys conducted in the Spring of 1998 to student retention the following year.

Of the 1069 students who submitted analyzable questionnaires (for the student satisfaction survey project of spring 1998), 735 (69%) returned in the Fall Term of 1998, 89 (8%) withdrew from Berea, 132 (12%) graduated, and 113 (11%) could not be identified because of missing names on the survey instruments. The following brief report relates the survey responses to student retention. Please note that when the term "significant difference" is used, I mean statistically significant difference which is a difference that is extremely unlikely (less than 5% chance) to be due simply to chance variation.

Did ratings of satisfaction distinguish students who persisted to the next year from those who dropped out?

Yes, ratings of satisfaction for various survey items were statistically significantly different for persisters and dropouts. The items fell into several categories including: general perceptions of campus experiences, academics, labor, and spiritual and personal development.

General perceptions of campus experiences: Dropouts expressed less satisfaction with their experiences at Berea as evidenced by significantly lower satisfaction ratings for items related to a sense of pride in the campus and a belief that it was well maintained, an ability to experience intellectual growth, and finding Berea an enjoyable experience overall. Also, dropouts expressed lower agreement when asked if they would re-enroll if they had it to do over and if they felt lucky to be admitted to Berea.

Academics: Dropouts indicated significantly lower satisfaction than did persisters with several aspects of their academic life. These included significantly lower satisfaction with items related to the encouragement, enthusiasm, and caring they felt from faculty. They gave lower satisfaction ratings to the quality of instruction in their major field and the content and variety of courses in general. Dropouts also indicated less satisfaction with the approachability of their academic advisers. They were less satisfied with their advisers' helpfulness in setting goals and knowledge of requirements in the major. Finally, dropouts reported significantly lower satisfaction ratings for two specific GSTR courses, Western Traditions I and II, and also indicated lower satisfaction with general studies courses helping them to become better writers.

Labor: Dropouts indicated significantly lower satisfaction with the value of their labor experience, their ability to learn skills and work habits that will help in the future, and opportunities to explore personal interests through the labor program.
Spiritual and personal development: Dropouts reported significantly lower satisfaction with their spiritual needs being met at Berea and experiencing spiritual growth while here. They also reported lower satisfaction with Berea "helping to develop the whole person."

How did persisters versus dropouts answer particular questions designed to evaluate drop-out risk?

A higher percentage of students who went on to drop out of Berea (versus those who persisted or graduated) reported that they had, in fact, considered dropping out of Berea. Slightly less than half of the persisters and graduates (48% and 43%, respectively) reported having considered dropping out compared to 68% of those students who did go on to withdraw. Female versus male dropouts were more likely to indicate on the survey that they had considered dropping out of Berea (74% versus 58%, respectively). Dropouts were also much less likely to respond positively to the item, "I would choose to attend Berea if I had it to do over again." Less than half (40%) of the dropouts indicated "yes" compared to 65% of the graduates and 67% of the persisters.

The most commonly cited reasons for considering dropping out of Berea were similar for dropouts, persisters, and graduates. The dropouts most commonly cited "I have had difficulty managing school, work, and college life in general" followed by "My emotional health has been poor" followed by "Finances are a problem." Persisters were more likely to cite as most important, "My emotional health has been poor" followed by "I have had difficulty managing school, work and college life in general," followed by "The major I want isn't offered here." Graduates most commonly cited "Finances are a problem," followed by "My expectations of a Christian environment have not been met," followed by "My emotional health has been poor."

A slightly higher percentage of dropouts (versus persisters or graduates) indicated that they had "not at all" adjusted well to the demands of college life and reported feeling constantly stressed (21% of dropouts, 17% of persisters, and 15% of graduates).

A lower percentage of dropouts compared to persisters or graduates reported that Berea was their first choice of institutions (61% of dropouts versus 72% of persisters versus 76% of graduates).

Dropouts reported substantially less contact with professors than did persisters. For example, dropouts were more than twice as likely as persisters to indicate that they had never sought out individual attention from professors (17% of dropouts versus 6% of persisters). Dropouts were also more likely to indicate that the amount of individual attention they received from professors was not adequate (24% of dropouts versus 11% of persisters).

When respondents asked if they had ever received advising that led to taking an unnecessary course, 35% of the persisters, 44% of the graduates, and nearly half (49%) of the dropouts indicated that this had happened to them.

How did persisters compare to dropouts in pre-college academic preparation?
Graduates and persisters had significantly higher high school rankings than did dropouts (mean of 83 percentile for high school class rank for graduates versus 76 for persisters versus 67 for dropouts). Graduates had significantly higher ACT mathematics scores than did dropouts. The average ACT mathematics score was 20.7 for graduates versus 20.1 for persisters versus 19.1 for dropouts. Graduates and persisters actually had lower high school grade point averages than did dropouts. Graduates' average grade point average was 2.60 which is significantly lower than persisters and dropouts whose average grade point averages were 2.99 and 3.10, respectively. I can think of three possible explanations for this pattern of results (there may be many others). The first two are based on reasons that do not have anything to do with academic preparation differences. The third explanation is psychological in nature. The three include:

1) Because graduates largely represent a group of students who have been out of high school longer, it is possible that high school grades have been inflated over the past few years thereby explaining why graduates had significantly lower high school grade point averages than "younger" students.

2) Dropouts may have taken less rigorous courses of study in high school which resulted in higher high school grade point averages than persisters or graduates.

3) Students who entered college with better high school grades possessed higher expectations for college grades than did students with lower high school grades. When these higher expectations were not met, the anxiety or disappointment was dealt with more often by dropping out.

Some limitations, observations, and benefits concerning these initial analyses.

Several limitations are inherent in these analyzes. The number of dropouts is based only on the 89 students who filled out these surveys and did not graduate or re-enroll for Fall 1998. We need to keep in mind that as more of the students involved in the survey project drop out, different correlates and patterns of risk may appear. Also, the differences among persisters, drop-outs, and graduates for this particular group of students may not be reliable for future cohorts of students. We won't know if the results are generalizable to future students unless we repeat the surveys and retention analyses in later years.

It is interesting to me how many of the items do not appear to differentiate among persisters and dropouts. I would recommend taking a close look at the original instruments and specifically attending to items that did not show significant differences. Although many of these items may still be extremely important areas to address (because satisfaction levels were lower than our sensibilities may require), improvements in specific areas may not result in noticeable changes in student retention. I will be glad to work with the group to "walk through" the instruments pointing out where significant differences did and did not appear. I did not want to burden this brief report with a full account of statistical analyses for each of the hundreds of items.

Finally, we need to think about what kinds of processes or information could help us establish cause and effect relationships between satisfaction and dropout risk. The present analyses and other types of self-reported feedback cannot determine cause and effect relationships. These types of studies can only show that certain attitudes or experiences correlate more or less with staying or leaving. Proving cause and effect relationships is difficult at best and nearly impossible in academic settings where controlled experimental procedures cannot be put in place.

However, taking the approach of 1) listening to student concerns, 2) acting to improve experiences on various fronts, and 3) documenting and monitoring results conforms to institutional effectiveness (IE) strategies. The IE approach may or may not result in obvious changes in one particular measure of student success (e.g., retention), but it may help improve or strengthen areas of concern. Therefore, the purpose of the present report is not to limit or narrow our thinking or actions in any way, but rather, to enrich the conversation regarding understanding student experiences.
